Dear Elizabeth,

I hope you are well.

I wanted to share with you the attached article just published by the prestigious journal Nature Medicine entitled Sex on the brain: Unraveling the differences between women and men in neurodegenerative disease. In the article, the Alzheimer's Association is highlighted in helping to lead the way to understanding why women are disproportionately affected by Alzheimer's. Because this article is circulated to a large and diverse scientific audience, this disparity is brought to the attention of the greater scientific community, bringing new perspectives and more intellectual fire-power to this complex problem. From our conversations, I think you will enjoy this article; it is a fascinating read delving into the differences of women and men, as it relates to the brain.

As you know, we initiated a think tank on this topic that ultimately led to the Sex and Gender in Alzheimer's grant program, and we were so happy to have you join us for that meeting to share your comments and insights. We are grateful for supporters like you that made this initiative possible. We are looking forward to this program moving forward and bring more insight to this important issue. Thank you again for helping us move toward a world without Alzheimer's.

Warmly,

Maria
