Wyoming has no relevant statutes, but by regulation specifies the requirements for managers of assisted living facilities, and mandates that managers pass an open book test on Assisted Living Facility Licensure and Program Administration Rules with a passing score of 85% or greater.

In addition, Wyoming regulates secure dementia units of assisted living facilities, and requires that at least one staff member with specialized training must be on hand at all times. The regulation requires that administrators or managers have at least eight (8) of 16 hours of annual continuing education related to caring for individuals with severe cognitive impairments. It also requires that assisted living direct-care staff receive an additional 12 hours annually of training related to the provision of care and supervision to individuals with severe cognitive impairment. The areas of additional training are comprehensive, and include: the skills necessary to care for, intervene, and direct residents who are unable to independently perform activities of daily living; techniques for minimizing challenging behaviors; therapeutic programming to support the highest level of residents function; promoting residents dignity, independence, individuality, privacy, and choice; identifying and alleviating safety risks to residents; recognizing common side effects and reactions to medications; and techniques for dealing with bowel and bladder aberrant behavior.
